A little before sunrise on Aug. 25, 2017, sophomore James Hansen pulled his 1999 Chevy truck into the brand new parking lot. He parked in the middle of a row southeast of the activities door entrance. No one else was around.

A clean slate. The first person on the first day at the new $84 million high school on 100th Street. "Wow I'm really early... too early," he thought to himself.

He was worried about securing a parking spot even though the new lot consisted of 1,200 spots, 400 more than the old high school. "When I was a freshman I would always go to the side road (N.W. 59th Ct.) to get a good spot and they were always full, so I would always have to park at the city hall, and it was a really far walk," Hansen said.

About a hour later, the traffic was so heavy police diverted vehicles from 100th Street west on 62nd Avenue, then north on 106th Street to enter the southwest corner of the parking lot. The lot was filled. Students filed into the building. The new school year started with a
